WHAT COMES NATURALLY

ONCE upon a time an ant was lugging a piece of twig up an anthill. All the other ants were lugging pieces of twigs up the ant-hill, also. Suddenly this ant, whose name was Anthony, said to himself, "Why am I carrying this stupid, old twig? It's five times bigger than I am. And where am I carrying it? And why?"

No sooner had he said this to himself than he stopped and put the twig down. All around him the other ants stared at him as if he were crazy. But they went right on working, and lugging, and toiling. Anthony Ant shrugged and walked away from the ant-hill.

Pretty soon he came to a stream. The water looked less blue than usual. In fact it looked so pink. A whole gang of bright pink salmon were swimming upstream. All except one. She lay in a sheltered cove behind some rocks near the bank. Anthony Ant leaned over and asked her, "Why aren't you swimming with the others?"

"Why?" she repeated. "Simply because I said to myself, 'Why am I doing all this?' " Her little pink gills throbbed in and out rapidly with weariness. "There I was, swimming upstream, against a terrible current, for no reaason at all. Swimming upstream against the current, going nowhere, just because everybody else was doing it. Phooey! said I, and that's why I'm here. I've quit!"

Anthony Ant said, "I've quit, too. Let's stick together."

So the ant walked along the bank, chatting with the salmon while she swam leisurely downstream with the current. "My name is Cynthia," she began, but just then they came to a commotion in a woods.

"Why should I?" a monkey was saying. "I don't feel like it."

"But you must crack coconuts or you'll go hungry!" all the other monkeys were screeching. "All monkeys do it. It's their favorite pastime."

"Well, it's not my favorite pastime!" declared the monkey, whose name was Marty.

And that's how it happened that three friends continued the trip. Soon Marty Monkey, Cynthia Salmon, and Anthony Ant met up with a fourth. This time it was Rita Robin. They were surprised to see a robin up north in the wintertime. All birds except sparrows were supposed to go south in winter. But as Rita explained it, "Why should I go south just because all other robins do?"

"You," said Anthony, "belong with us." And they continued on their way.

Soon they came to a tree in which lived a wise, old owl. He blinked when he saw them and let out a hoot. They stopped. "This interests me," said the wise, old owl. "I see you four seem to be great friends. But what do you have in common? I see one animal, a monkey. And one bird, a robin. And one insect, an ant. And one fish, a salmon. You are a peculiar combination. What's up?"

"Well . . . uh . . ." they couldn't seem to explain. But when each had told his story, and when the owl finally understood, he said: "Now I see what you have in common. You each lack instinct."

"Instinct?" None of them knew what that meant.

"Well," the owl explained, blinking quickly, "It is a salmon's instinct which sends him upstream against the current. It is a monkey's instinct which sets him to cracking coconuts all the time. It is a robin's instinct to fly south in the winter. It is an ant's instinct to toil hard on the anthill."

"Hurrah for us!" the four pals laughed.

"It is nothing to hurrah about!" counselled the wise old owl. "Without instincts you are in great danger."

"What?" The 4 looked at him in alarm.

"You see," he went on, "It is one's instinct which keeps him safe from harm. Without instinct, we would not fear fire, and would be burned. We would not fear falling, and would step off cliffs. We would not fear drowning, and would jump in the ocean without learning to swim. We would—"

"Oh dear me!" the four pals couldn't wait to hear the rest. They scurried off in all directions to do what they should have done in the first place.

"And that, in itself is an instinct!" laughed the wise, old owl as he watched the four creatures regaining their senses, "—the instinct of self-preservation!"
